My qualities

Core Quality: Selfless

I care a lot about the people around me and usually try to help whenever I can. I often say yes to things because I want to support others, even when it causes me stress or makes things harder for myself.

Pitfall: Self-Sacrificing

Because I focus so much on helping other people, I sometimes ignore my own feelings and needs. I can end up putting other people first even when it's not the best thing for me.

Allergy: Selfishness, Entitlement, and Ingratitude

I really don't like people who think they're above others or believe they deserve things without putting in any effort. I also struggle with people who are selfish or don't appreciate what others do for them. Those attitudes go against my values of helping and supporting the people around me.

Challenge: Setting Boundaries

I need to get better at saying no when I don't want to do something or when it will only leave me feeling stressed, uncomfortable, or unhappy. I want to learn how to help others without constantly putting my own needs aside.

This is Ana-Maria's quadrants.

She has the core quality of Understanding.

This is Ana-Maria's quadrant. Her core quality is understanding. This connects well with my challenge of setting boundaries, because she is the type of person who understands and respects it when I say no or explain that something does not work for me. Looking at her core quality helped me realize that setting boundaries does not mean being selfish. It is possible to communicate my needs while still maintaining a good relationship with others.

Theory Behind Offmans:

The core quality quadrant was developed by Daniel Ofman and is a model user for personal development and self-reflection. The model helps people gain insight into their strengths and weaknesses, challenges, and the behaviors that can irritate them. According to Ofman, every person has core qualities that make them unique and effective, but sometimes if a quality is taken to far it becomes a 'pitfall'.

The model consists of four parts:

Core Quality

A core quality is a person's positive characteristic or strength. Examples include being helpful, understanding, creative, responsible, and, in my case, selfless. These qualities often come naturally and are usually recognized by both the individual and the people around them.

Pitfall

A pitfall is often the result of a core quality being overused. For example, a helpful person may become too involved in other people's problems. In my case, being selfless can sometimes result in stress because I agree to do things that I do not really want to do or that negatively affect my own well-being.

Challenge

A challenge is the positive opposite of a pitfall. It is a quality or behavior that a person can develop to create a better balance. In my case, I need to improve my ability to set boundaries so that I do not sacrifice my own needs too often while helping others.

Allergy

An allergy is a behavior in other people that clashes with a person's core quality. In my case, I have an allergy to selfishness, entitlement, and ingratitude. I struggle with people who only think about themselves, believe they deserve things without putting in effort, or fail to appreciate what others do for them. These behaviors conflict with my value of supporting and helping others.

Daniel Ofman developed the Core Quality Quadrant to help people understand themselves and others a bit better. His idea was that what we often see as weaknesses can actually be strengths that are taken too far. For example, someone who is very helpful might start getting too involved in other people's problems, while someone who is selfless might end up putting everyone else's needs before their own.

The challenge is there to help keep a balance between your strengths and the pitfalls that can come with them. It is not about changing who you are, but about learning how to use your strengths in a way that works well. By working on your challenge, you can stop your strengths from becoming weaknesses and keep developing yourself both personally and professionally.
